

Andi Durham

Travel Award Report

During the week of May 22nd through the 27th, I traveled to Washington D.C. to present at the Association for Psychological Science conference. There I presented my poster on How Religiosity Predicts Self-Harm. During my time at the conference, I attended seminars and speeches. One speech that I heard was about the Psychology of Conspiracy Theories which was quite interesting. Furthermore, on the 26th when I presented my poster, quite a few professors and other students approached my poster and asked me very thought provoking questions that will help me better the study and maybe possible reconduct it with the inclusion of their feedback. I was thankful for the opportunity to go to this conference, and it simply reassured me that psychology is my desired career path.