Stanford Research Conference at Stanford University in Stanford, CA.

April 13th-15th

The conference chose 60 students from 400 applicants across America, Europe, and Mexico to give poster presentations in all disciplines. The quality of research demonstrated at the conference challenged me to push further into my own exploration of my field and inspired collaborative ideas with biological researchers.

The weekend allowed me to associate with top scholars in the undergraduate community. The standards to which they held themselves encouraged the same for me. As well, my respect for MSU deepened because the quality of these top scholars was comparable to the students at my home university, proving that MSU is a top university for research.

Part of the reason MSU excels is the Shackouls Honors College. This college is responsible for pushing student to do research, guiding them to the right labs, funding independent research, and assisting in the dissemination of that research. In particular, my opportunity to attend the Stanford Research Conference was made entirely possible by the Shackouls Honors College, and for that I am forever grateful.
